In my painting I have been working for more than two decades on an extensive family album. My research into the complexity of family connections has evolved from the personal into the universal. It increasingly includes elective kinship relationships, alter egos, art historical and neurobiological quotations, as well as mythological and contemporary historical elements. I use the distinct physical and sensual qualities of encaustic painting to visually explore the recurrent themes of my work: Overwritings of memories, paradoxical communications, intergenerational emotional inheritance and afterimage phenomena.

Seit mehr als zwei Dekaden arbeite ich an einem umfangreichen malerischen Familienalbum, das sich aus dem Privaten ins Universelle entwickelte und das im Zuge der thematischen Auseinandersetzung zunehmend wahlverwandtschaftliche Beziehungen, Alter Egos, kunsthistorische und neurobiologische Zitate sowie mythologische und zeitgeschichtliche Elemente mit einschließt. Überschreibungen von Erinnertem, paradoxe Kommunikation, generationsübergreifendes emotionales Erbe sowie Nachbilder-Phänomene sind Themen meiner auf Enkaustik basierenden Malerei.

La Reconnaissance

RE-COGNITION

Self-portrait, self-recognition portrait, recognition, reconnaissance – in an age of omnipresent surveillance cameras, biometric (and thus standardized) passport photos, machine facial recognition, be it for unlocking end devices or as a sorting function in a digital photo gallery, Eva Schwab plays with the genre of Portraits. Where otherwise souvenir photos across time look back at us from picture frames, sometimes revealing, rarely mysterious, even more rarely as if they have just solidified into color, on the cloths, the waxarelles and pixelated, alienated faces in the commissioned crochet works by Maria Porcu are the faces in the scanning process, in the Attempt at detection wiped out. But then, upon viewing longer, something strange happens: whoever looks at these works begins to see themselves in them, not as a double, but rather as a reflection of a process of self-knowledge that is interrupted but not hopeless. Who is looking at us there? What remains of the face and expression after the machine capture?

With this question, formulated even more explicitly here, Schwab lures people into her Cabinet of Reconnaissance in another part of the series. On the outside of the triangular cabinet, the facial recognition grid can be found again, this time as a portrait of a skinless creature that invites you to look inside using X-ray vision. It is flanked by mutated insects, scanned matryoshkas and snake women. When the cabinet opens, it becomes a mirrored square to a crystalline fiberglass shaft.

Finally, the Tube of Reconnaissance offers those who enter it the opportunity to become a painterly portrait and, as it were, to view the surrounding reality as an afterimage. The narrow nylon gauze tube, a one-person cabin, is painted with wax and ink. The viewer enters a translucent protective space through the translucent layers. For those outside it becomes a painting, but inside it is clearly in touch, while the rooms become blurred. The distance from the world enables a new type of recognition. And in between: the fine fabric and the color, which only become apparent as a work of art when the gaze is almost entirely directed inwards. Perception lays on top of perception. One recognition requires the other.
